

McDermott (1949)
pg. 317

A great many houses have been badly damaged, but no one was killed. The earth opened in many places, especially about three miles from our monastery. Only sand and water came from the opening. Fortunately our poor cabins of wood and sand can withstand a great deal of shaking without much danger. Their undress logs piled one on top of another can be separated only by considerable force. Some stone and brick houses have had to be abandoned.